It's Never Too Late to Learn to Read

By Jackie Fitzpatrick

W hen Mrs. Cook was a little girl she was often lonely and often bored. She was always curious about the world around her, but she found it difficult to stay interested in things for very long. She was also always afraid of the dark, and so she would often stay inside all day, reading and playing games.

But when she was about six years old, things began to change. She started to learn to read, and this opened up a whole new world to her. She could now read books and magazines, and this was something that she had never been able to do before. She was very happy, and she continued to learn to read as much as she could.

Today, Mrs. Cook is a teacher, and she is always eager to help her students learn to read. She knows that reading is a very important skill, and she wants to help her students develop this skill as much as possible.

The program has had more than 100 graduates from it, and Mrs. Cook said that it is very rewarding to see the difference that reading can make in a person's life.

"I love seeing my students grow and become more confident as they learn to read," she said. "It's a wonderful feeling to see them succeed."
